'The last mode which regard till recently as to whether Pahlavi is Semitic or Persian' has been cleared by the discovery that it is merely a way of writing Persian, in which the Persian words are partly represented—to the eye not to the ear—by their Semitic equivalents'. Thus 'for bread they wrote lehm, i.e. the Aramaic lahma, but they pronounced nân, which is the common Persian word for bread, similarly מים, the Aramaic Jamā Sesh, was pronounced as the Persian ghalā'. Neither seems quite satisfactory as to the name; the OF. word being applied to all vases to a shallow depth; while OE. pægel appears to have been a small measure: cf. Lit. pegel, Gk. pēgos, pēl, half a pint. The Dutch pegel is difficult to bring into line. Kilian 1598 has pegher 'capacity or measure of a vessel'; Moxhon 1705 has 'the concavity or the capacity of a vessel or of a pot'. But see also Du. pegel, pail has the sense 'gauge, scale, mark', which was also the sense to Minsheu, going back, according to French, to an OFris. pegel* 'little peg or pin', etc., and 'used as a mark', to be compared with Eng. peg and Du. dial. pegel (above) an original sense remote from that of Eng. pail or even OE. pægel.]

†Paisocke. [Known only in the passage cited. It has been variously viewed by editors as a misprint for peacocke, peacocks, or other obs. form of Peacock, or as some dialect form of that word, or as being the older spelling (with i for j) of pajock, for an alleged northern Sc. paa-jock = peacock. Various other conjectures have been offered.

The spelling paisocke or paicocke is found in the First Folio in the 2 other places where the word occurs, and there means no peacock: why Hamlet should have cast a proxy Italian word. Palæotherе, paleo- (pæ|liǫθī·rɪ, pæ|l-). Often in L. form palæotherium. [f. PALÆO- + Gr. θηρίον beast.] A perissodactyl mammal of the extinct genus Palæotherium, comprising several species of tapir-like form, varying from the size of a horse to that of a hog; their fossil remains are found in Eocene and Miocene strata. (In the Eng. form extended to other members of the extinct family Palæotheriidæ.)

1825 W. PHILLIPS *Outl. Palæotype (pæ|liǫtaip). [f. PALÆO- + TYPE.] A system of writing devised by A. J. Ellis, in which the 'old types' (i. e. existing Roman letters and other characters), in their various forms and combinations, are used to form a universal phonetic alphabet. Also attrib. or as adj. Hence Palæotypic (-ti·pik) a.

1869 A. J. ELLIS E. E. Pronunc. I. 1 It refer to be con-

Palæozoic, palæo- (pæ·lĭozō·ĭk, pălĭ-), a. Geol. [f. Palæo- + Gr. ζωή life, ζῷον living + -ic.] 1. Characterized by, containing, or pertaining to ancient forms of life. As introduced by Sedgwick, in 1838, it was applied to the Cambrian and Silurian strata; as extended by Phillips, 1841, it comprises all the fossiliferous strata up to the Permian, the higher strata being Mesozoic and Cainozoic.

1838 Sedgwick in Q. Trnl. Geol. Soc. II. 48 Class II as Palæozoic Series. This includes all the groups of formations between Class I (Primary crystalline rocks called by Sedgwick Protozoic) and the Old Red Sandstone, and subdivided as follows: 1 Lower Cambrian 2 Upper Cambrian; 3 Silurian System. 1840 Phillips in Penny Cycl. XVI. 484/1 We include in the term 'Palæozoic', all the generally stratiform and crystalline rocks between the meta schist and the old red sandstone. Ibid. XVII. 134/1 The term Palæozoic may be retained, though it should be found that the application of it ought to be extended so as to include the carboniferous rocks or even the magnesian limestone. This method is not unlikely. 1840 Phillips Palæozoic Fossils (1860) 1 I have suggested the ... proposed (1860) Cainozoic System ... Mesozoic System ... Palæozoic System: Upper = Magnesian Limestone formation, Carboniferous system; Middle = Gilsit and South Devon; Lower = Transition Strata; Primary Strata. 1858 Darwin in Life & Lett. (1887) II. 82 Not a fragment of secondary or palæozoic rock has been found. 1880 Huxley *Phys. Palæozoology, palæo- (-zōŏ·lŏdʒi). [f. Palæo- + Zoology.] That department of zoology, or of palæontology, which treats of extinct or fossil animals. (Correlative to Palæobotany.)

1857 in Mayne Expos. Lex. 1881 R. E. Grayer *Tal. Fossil Fauna Penn. Palætiology (-pălĭtĭ·ŏlŏdʒi). rare. Also palæitio-. [f. for palæ-ætiology*, f. Gr. παλαιός ancient + Ætiology; after palæontology.] Used by Whewell for the application of existing principles of cause and effect to the explanation of past phenomena.

1837 Whewell Hist. Induct. Sc. 1st. III. 481 The sciences which treat of causes have sometimes been termed ætiological: ..a portion of that science on which we are about to enter, palæitiology, has been termed palæontology; since it treats of beings which formerly existed. Hence, combining these two notions, the term palæitiology appears to be not inappropriate, to describe those speculations which have refer to actual past events, but attempt to explain them by laws of causation.

So Palæ·tiological a., of, belonging to, or using the methods of palæitiology; Palæ·tiologist, one who investigates or treats of a subject in a palæitiological way.

1837 Whewell Hist. Induct. Sc. 1st. Palagonite (pălĭgŏnəit). Min. [ad. Ger. Palagonit (Waltershausen, 1846), f. Palagonia in Sicily, one of its localities.] A volcanic rock of vitreous structure, allied to basalt. Palagonite-tuff, a 'tuff' or porous rock composed of fragments of basaltic lava and palagonite.

1863 Bosworth-Geikie Iceland 208 The hill is composed of Palagonite tuff. 1879 Rutley Stud. Rocks xiii. 272 Under the microscope palagonite appears as a perfectly amorphous substance. 1896 Cohen Manual of Min., Palagonite, a basaltic tuff, formerly considered a mineral species.

Pan, obs. form of Panne; obs. Sc. form of Pane.

Pan-, combining form and formative element, repr. Gr. παν- from πᾶς, genitive of πᾶς all, which was freely used in Greek, esp. with adjs. to which it stood in adverb. relation in the sense 'all, wholly, entirely, altogether, by all, of all', as in παντέφυτος altogether good, πανάγιος all-holy, πανάγιστος all-healing, πανάριστος best of all, πανημέριος united to all musical modes, πανθεμαῖος pertaining to all the people, paltic, πάνοπλος fully-armed, πανόπτερος of the full moon, πάνσοφος all-wise; so from national names, as πανελλήνιος of all the Greeks, πανάκαιος of all the Iaonians; also in obs., etc. derived from these adjs., and some other obs., as πανδήμιος an all-receiver, πανήγυρις ruler of all, πανήγυρις a national or general assembly, πανεγκὼς panoply.

Hence pan- occurs in English in words taken or derived from Greek, and in many others formed more or less on the same analogy either in English, mod. or mod. Latin, or French. It is especially common with national names, after πανελλήνιος, panslavism, etc., where it has become a living suffix, prefixed whenever needed. Before a labial πανβ- becomes pam-, and before a guttural πανγ- (= pang-), as πάμφιλος, πανφίλιστος beloved of all, πάγκαλος the sweetheart, the panacea; the former of these is retained in some English derivatives (see Pam-).

The following are examples of the uses of pan-; the more important words will be found in their places as Main words.

1. With national names, and words formed in imitation of them, with the sense 'Of, pertaining to, or comprising all (those indicated in the body of the word)'; with -dom and -ist, generally expressing the notion of or aspiration for the political union of all those indicated, a sense which also tends to colour the adj. Of modern formations of this kind, Panhellenism and Panslavism, with their related words, appear to have been the earliest. Among others are: Pan-Anglican a., of or including all of 'Anglo-Saxon' race. Pan-anthropological a., of all anthropologists. Pan-arianic a., consisting of all the Aryans (Jonesian). Pan-Buddhist a., of or embracing all Buddhists; so Pan-Buddhism. Pan-Celtic a., of all Celts, or all the Celtic peoples; hence Pan-Celticism. Pan-Christian a., universal Christian. Pan-denominational a., of or embracing all religious denominations. Pan-ecclesiastical a., representing a whole church or ecclesiastical body. Pan-Gothic a., common to or including all the Gothic or Teutonic races or languages, Germanic. Pan-human a., of or per-

Pandora[2] (pændō·rə), pandore (pændō·r). Also 7-8 pandura, (8 pandaia), 9 pandura, pandur. [a. It. pandora (also pandora), F. pandore, ad. L. pandūra, a. Gr. πανδοῦρα, a musical instrument the invention of which was attributed to Pan. [But the word was prob. of foreign origin.]

A stringed musical instrument of the cithar type, the same as the BANDORA.

The original Greek and Roman pandura is described as a kind of lute with three strings: such an instrument is still used in some eastern lands under the name pandur. But the original type has at different times, and in different countries, undergone many changes in form, in the number and material of the strings, the mode of construction of the sound-box, etc. Equally numerous are the modifications of the name: cf. BANDORA, BANJO, MANDOLINE. The changes of form and name have not always gone together: the Neapolitan pandora, for instance, retaining the ancient name, is a musical instrument larger than the mandoline, strung with eight metal wires, and played with a quill.

Pandour, pandoor (pændiʉə(r)). Also pandore. [= F. pandour, Ger. pandur; all a. Serbocroatian pándur, 'a constable, bailiff, beadle, sumpmaster, or catchpole; a mounted policeman or guardian of the public peace; a watcher of fields and vineyards', having also in earlier times the duty of guarding the frontier districts from the inroads of the Turks. For ulterior etymology see Note below. The sense in which the word became known in Western Europe is involved in the history of TRENCK's body of panduors.]

1. In pl. The name borne by a local force organized in 1746 by Baron Trenck on his own estates in Croatia to clear the country near the Turkish frontier of bands of robbers; subsequently enrolled as a regiment in the Austrian Army, where, under Trenck, their capacity and brutality caused them to be dreaded over Germany, and made Pandour synonymous in Western Europe with 'brutal Croatian soldier'.

†2. In local use, in Croatia, Servia, Hungary, etc.: A guard; an armed servant or retainer; a member of the local mounted constabulary.

1680 Hist. Rem. 7 Feb. 1/1/2 A small body of guards, called pandours, is, by intercepted maps, attached to the establishment (the customary of St. John of Rots). 1688 W. J. TUCKER S. Europe 159 The 'pandores' came to fetch him, and dragged him before the commander. Ibid. 169 These Pandors, your gallies, your mounted constabulary, or whatever you call them, are they of no use?

[1850 The word pandour, with all its many of the senses mentioned above, is found in nearly all the South Slavonic (Servian) dialects, and in Magyar, also as pandúr: in Roumanian it has entered Turkish as pandúr. Earlier forms in Magyar and Serbo-croatian were bandúr, bandur: the former is still used in and near Ragusa. The word is not earlier either in Magyar or Servian, and the question of its origin and course of diffusion in those tongues is involved in considerable obscurity. But Slavonic scholars are now generally agreed in referring it through the earlier bandur, bandur, to med.L. bandurius, orig. 'a follower of a standard or banner': see BANDERIAL, or to some Italian or Provençal word akin to this. Among reasons evidenced by Du Cange for bandurius (and banneretus), are those of 'guard of constables and sheriffs', also 'sumpter, equerry', which are both senses of pándur.] Ib. bandúrus (Venetian bandúro) has also the sense of 'sumpter'. The alleged derivation of the word from Pandur or Pandur Fourth, 'a village in Lower Hungary', given in Bruce & Grober's Cyclopædia, and repeated in many English Dictionaries, is absolutely baseless.]

Pandowdy (pændau·di). U. S. [Of obscure origin; perh. a corruption of PAN pl.?] Halliwell cites from Bp. Kennett's MS. pandledd a custard (Somerset); but this is now unknown in England.] A kind of apple pudding, variously seasoned, but usually with molasses, and baked in a deep dish with or without a crust.

6. Scots Law. In the phrase on or upon the panel = upon (his, one's) trial. Also, in later use, on the panel, etc.

The original sense of panel here is uncertain. It seems most probable that for the analogy of sense 4 it means a slip of parchment, containing the indictment, or the name or names of the persons indicted. To be on the pan.l would then be to be inscribed, and so on one's trial. It was in like manner used to use the term edictally for the name or names, and so, the person or persons, on the panel, as in L. where note that the word is collective. In later times, 'the panel has been sometimes understood as a place, viz. "the bar of the court" (or pannelwood) on the dock. Cf. the phrases to the panel, to put or bring over the panel, to enter the panel.

Panlogism (pæ-nlo'dʒĭz'm). [ad. mod.L. panlogismus, f. Gr. πᾶν- all + λόγος speech, word, reason: see -ISM.] A term formed by J. E. Erdmann (Deutsche Spekulation seit Kant (1834) II. 833) on the analogy of pantheismus, to describe the philosophy of Hegel, as one which holds that only the rational is truly real. (Generally used with an implication of dissent from the position so characterized.) Hence Panlogi'stic a., pertaining to or of the nature of panlogism.

1851 Lewes Hist. Philos. (ed. 4) II. 603 By Erdmann, Hegel's system is happily characterised as Panlogism rather than Pantheism, since, instead of permitting the universe as the revelation of God, he presents it, and God also, as the evolution of the abstract Idea. 1872 *Contemp. Weismann's term for a supposed promiscuous reproduction of all manner of ancestral qualities or tendencies, consequent on the cessation of natural selection in relation to organs which have become useless or little used, and tending to the degeneration of these organs.

1889 Poulton, etc. in Weismann's Ess. Heredity 40 This succession of the preserving influence of natural selection may be termed Panmixia, for all individuals can reproduce themselves and thus many their characters upon the species, and not only those which are in all respects, or in respect to some single organ, the fittest, the great variability of most domesticated animals essentially depends upon this principle. 1890 Nat. Lancashire to Harvard 21 May, Weis's The doctrine of panmixia is this. When there is no longer, owing to changed conditions of life, any use for an organ, it will cease to be the subject of natural selection. Consequently all possible variations . . will have no bar to the now useless use of the organ in question as equal chances. 1894 Mivart in Harper's Mag. Mar., A fortuitous mixture of ancestral tendencies . . called panmixia.

1. Another name for the Leopard (Felis pardus); popularly applied to large leopards.

As with other exotic animals, the name, handed down from the Latin writers, was known long before the animal; all the early references merely reflect the conceptions of ancient authors and their mediæval commentators. These statements were long believed in other to a least distant from the beginning, is called encouraged by there being two Latin names panthera and pardus, as to the distinction between which the ancient writers themselves were not clear, and by fabulous notions as to the generation of the leopard as a hybrid between the lion and the 'pard', and as to the sweet fragrance lidded to be exhaled by the panther. Down to modern times (cf. quot. 1817) the 'panther' was supposed to be at least a larger and more powerful kind of leopard, a distinction not scientifically tenable.

Panto- (panto), before a vowel PANT-, repr. Gr. παντο- (παντ-, πανθ-), combining form of πᾶς, πᾶν (stem παντ-) all, already used in ancient Gr. (where often interchangeable with παν- PAN-) in forming adjs. and a few substantives used attrib., as πάνταγρος (Soph.) all-ruling, marvellously of all kinds, πανταρσίης almighty, πανταστέης centre of all; in later Gr. it became much more frequent. The word pantalgia was adopted in L. as pantalgēsia and thence came into French and English as pantalgie before 1600. Otherwise, the formation of words in panto- began in the 17th c., and became more frequent in the 19th; but this has not become a living element forming compounds like the cognate PAN- in Pan-Anglican, Pan-American, and the like. The chief derivatives of panto- appear in their alphabetical places; the following are of minor importance:

The explanation, says Park (in sibling Hard. Mss. 1808), 'seems to have been a cant phrase for doing a kind thing in an unkind manner; as if would be to feed an infant...'. But the same appears rather to be 'the administration of punishment under the kindest style of kindness or lenity'. In Eng. in 17th and early 18th c. the form varied between papa[1] and papa[2]; from the latter the American pa-pa.] A word employed as the equivalent of father: chiefly used in the vocative, or pred. by a possess. pronoun (as 'my papa'); also without any article in the manner of a proper name (e. g. 'I will ask Papa'); less usually with a or in plural.
At its first introduction from Fr., courtly and polite, and used even by adults; long considered 'quaint'; but more and more left to children, and in second half of 19th c. largely abandoned even by them.

It appears to be rather as French for 'mashed paper'. Cf. the translation papier or French for 'mashed paper'. Cf. the translation papier for making into embossing in Boyle's *Chem. Para-1 (parā), before a vowel or h usually par-, repr. Gr. παρα-, παρ-, combining form of παρά prep., occurring in words already formed in Greek, their adaptations, and derivatives, and in modern words formed on the model of these, and, in certain uses, as a living element, in the formation of technical nomenclature.

As a preposition, Gr. παρά had the sense 'by the side of, beside', whence 'alongside of, by, past, beyond', etc. In composition it had the same senses, with such cognate adverbial uses as 'to one side, aside, amiss, faulty, irregular, disordered, improper, wrong'; also expressing subsidiary relation, alteration, perversion, similation, etc. These senses also occur in English derivatives: see Paradaption, Paradise, Paradox, Parasite; Parallel; Parapherna; Paraselene; Parerga; Parergal, Parergy, Parergon, etc. Two groups of less usual technical words follow here.

I. Terms (substantival or adjectival) chiefly of Anatomy and Natural History, denoting or relating to an organ or part situated beside or near that denoted by the second element, or standing in some subsidiary relation to it; and of Pathology, denoting diseases affecting such parts, or designating disordered conditions and functions. These last are often Latin in form.

2. In Chemistry, para- is used to form:

a. Names of substances that are (or have been supposed to be) modifications of those to the names of which para- is prefixed, or that have been produced along with or instead of these, or, sometimes, that merely occur with them.

This nomenclature appears to have been first used by Berzelius in 1830 (cf. Poggendorff's Annalen XIX. 306, where he proposes acidum paraphosphoricum and paraphosphates, the acidum paratartaricum, a. paratartaricum).

In some cases the para- derivatives are isomers or polymers of the simple named substances (e.g. paraldehyde, paraformic acid); but in others they are entirely different bodies, with only closely related to them, e.g. naphthalene $C_{10}H_8$, paranaphthalene $C_{20}H_{16}$.

b. (More systematically) Names of isomeric benzene di-derivatives in which the two hydrogen-atoms replaced by another element or radical are symmetrically disposed in the benzene ring, being separated on each side by two other atoms; so 1 and 4 in the ring $\begin{smallmatrix}1\\6\end{smallmatrix}\!\!>\!\!<\!\!\begin{smallmatrix}2\\5\end{smallmatrix}$; e.g. paradichlorobenzene, $C_6H_4Cl_2H_4$. See ortho- 2. As these compound names are formed systematically, and are to number included, it is not necessary to give any list of the following:

1878 Trans. Chem. Soc. (1) 209 Five chapters employ the terms para-, meta-, ortho-, or any other name than to denoting 1:4, 1:3, and 1:2 compounds respectively. 1892 WATTS Dict. Chem. VI. 198 A second series of bi-derivatives of benzene—the Para. series—is produced from Kekulé-benzene. From the compound is obtained paranitrotoluene, which may be converted into para-bromotoluene, and from this may be prepared paradibromobenzene, paradinitrobenzene, and paradinitrodibromobenzene. These may be converted by reducing agents into paradiamidobenzene, paradiamidotoluene, and paradiamidodibrom. 1885 Anthony's Manipr. Anat. II. 270 We have called parahydroxyphenacetic (or acetol) one of the benzenes, and the para- three which one there are two others, one of which is ortho-dihydroxybenzene, or catechol, and the other meta-dihydroxybenzene, or resorcinol. There are then three substances, catechol, resorcinol and acetol, all having the same composition $C_6H_6O_2$, and distinguished from each other by the prefixes ortho, meta, and para attached to dihydroxybenzene.

Para-, 2. s. F. para-, s. It. para-, imperative of vb. parare 'to stand or defend, to cover from, to shield, to shroud, to shelter' (Florio); orig. 'to make ready, prepare'.—L. parāre; used with a sb. object, in phrases which have themselves become sbs., as para-sole lit. 'defend or shelter from sun', hence 'a sun-shade'; so parapluie fire-guard, fire-screen, paravents wind-screen, parapetto breast-guard, parapet. (Cf. analogous Fr. and Eng. compounds, as courre-chef, courre-feu, mako-chief, wind-sheild, sun-shade.) Italian para- has been adopted in Fr., which has added parapluie rain-screen, umbrella, paravente wind-guard, parachute, parafeu, etc. Thence English has PARAPET, PARADOS, PARASOL, PARACHUTE, with occasional humorous nonce-words, as Parabore, defence from horse, and occasional uses of the alien (French) words, paragrandine [L. grandine hail], parugrêle [F. grêle hail] protection against hail, parapluie [F. pluie rain] umbrella, parabrandre [F. brandre thunder] lightning-conductor, paravent [F. vent wind] defence against wind.

Parabanic (parăbæ·nik), a. Chem. [f. PARA- + BANIC below.] In parabanic acid, a dibasic acid, $CO_2(NH.CO)_2$, produced by the action of nitric acid on uric acid or alloxan: crystallizing in colourless prisms. When boiled with dilute acids, it is converted into oxalic acid and urea, whence it is sometimes called oxalyl carbamide or oxalyl urea. Hence Parabanate, a proposed substitute for the name parabanic acid, to express its parallelism to alloxan. Parabanāte, a salt of parabanic acid, as argentic parabanate, $CO_2(NAg.CO)_2$.

1847 Miller Elem. Chem. III. 633 Parabanic acid forms salts which are exceedingly unstable; parabanate of silver being the only salt which is permanent. 1866 Oxford Anim. Chem. 43 Paraban and alloxan are products of the oxidation of uric acid. 1873 Ralfe Phar. Chem. 31 xxviii, Kraukh in a researche, said to are paraban and alloxan, which are obtained by the oxidation of uric acid. 1877 Roscoe Org. Chem. 203 Parabanic acid is formed by boiling uric acid with strong nitric acid and other oxidising agents. ...(Note. The term barabanic was introduced by Liebig and Wöhler in 1838 (Annales XXVI. 280), but without any explanation of its formation. As they made parabanic acid by a reaction in which they expected to obtain alloxan, it is plain that para- was used in the sense 'beyond of', 'apocarbonic', the reading being that of alloxan, uric, and the 3 usually explode. It has been suggested that the latter is a version of cyan, and that the name was formed to express parabanic=(cyanuric+2 urea or carbamide, $C_3N_3H_3O_3$ and 2 alloxan, $CO_2(NH.CO)_2$); but as a fact, it was not till much later that the identity of urea and carbamide was discovered.)

Gr. παράβασις lit. a going aside, digression, stepping forward, f. παραβαίνειν to go aside, step forward.] In ancient Greek comedy, A part sung by the chorus, addressed to the audience in the poet's name, and unconnected with the action of the drama.

Parabema (parĭbī·mă). Pl. -mata. [a. mod. Gr. παράβημα, f. παρα- beside + βῆμα BEMA.] In Ves. VII. Byzantine churches, The part of the edifice on each side of the bema, when separated from the latter by a wall. Hence Parabema·tic a., pertaining to a parabema; supported on the parabemata.

1706 . To the earlier Greek geometers, including Archimedes, B.C. 287-212, who investigated only conics perpendicular to the radius of the cone, the parabola was known as ὀρθογωνίου κώνου τομὴ = conic rectangle cut = 'the (perpendicular) section of a right-angled cone'. The use of τετμημένη, 'application', in this sense is due to Apollonius of Perga, c. 250 B.C., and with him, referred to the fact that a rectangle on the abscissa, having an area equal to the square on the ordinate, can be 'applied' to the latus rectum, without either excess (as in the hyperbola), or deficiency (as in the ellipse). [See C. TAYLOR Anc. & Mod. Geom. 1911, T. L. HEATH Apollonius of Perga, Introd. 1. (Astron.) Apparent displacement, or difference in the apparent position, of an object, caused by actual change (or difference) of position of the point of observation: spec. the angular amount of such displacement or difference of position, being the angle contained between the two straight lines drawn to the object from the two different points of view, and constituting a measure of the distance of the object. Also transf. (quot. 1881).

In Astronomy there are two kinds of parallax, viz. diurnal and annual, the former when a celestial object is observed from opposite points on the earth's surface, the latter when observed from opposite points of the earth's orbit. As the mean or proper position of the body is that which it would have if viewed by the sun (see from the earth's centre as a point in a line with it), in the other case from the centre of its orbit, the parallax is primarily calculated and stated from these central points, and called geocentric and heliocentric respectively, the base lines of these being the earth's radius and the radius of its orbit. Horizontal parallax: the diurnal parallax of a heavenly body seen on the horizon.

Paraphernalia (pærĭfō·rnĭlĭă), sb. pl. [mod. L., neuter pl. of parapherndlis (see prec.), short for paraphernalia bona, paraphernal goods.]

1. Law. Those articles of personal property which the law allows a married woman to keep and, to a certain extent, deal with as her own.

The word paraphernæ was used by the Roman jurists to indicate all property which a married woman sui juris held apart from her dos (dower). Over such property the husband could exercise no rights without his wife's consent. In most modern systems of law, based on the Roman, paraphernalia bona (in Fr. biens paraphernaux) means much the same thing, but in English and Scottish Common law, under which all personal or movable property of a wife vested after marr in the husband, the paraphernalia became restricted to such purely personal belongings of a wife as dress, jewels, and the like. Those latter were regarded as, to a certain extent, appropriated to the wife, and on the husband's death were not treated as part of his succession, and the right of a creditor over them, in the event of the husband's bankruptcy, was restricted. But in modern England and Scotland his paraphernalia entirely includes articles in the nature of household furniture, even though these had been marriage presents to the wife. The effect of the 'Married Women's Property Acts' of 1870, etc., will ultimately be to deprive the term of all significance in English and Scottish legal practice.

Orthostichy.] A secondary spiral or oblique rank of lateral members, as leaves or scales, around the stem or axis, in a phyllotaxis in which the leaves, scales, etc. are close together, as in certain leaf-rosettes, pine-cones, etc.

1879 Bennett & Dyer in Sachs' Bot. 1. iii. 125 When the members of a spiral phyllotaxis with a constant angle of divergence stand sufficiently close to one another, spiral arrangements are easily seen and followed to the right and left which cross or less conceal the primary spiral. These rows are called Parastichies, and are particularly clear in the cones of species of Pinus. 1884 Bower & Scott De Bary's Phaner. 183 Two bundles ... come into contact—that from the one side following the parastichies composed of every third leaf, that from the other the parastichies composed of every fifth leaf.

Parasynovitis, -syphilitic, etc. : see Para-[1] 2.

‡ Parasynthesis (părăsĭn'thĭsĭs). Philol. [mod. a. Gr. παρασύνθετος, f. παρα- beside, alongside + σύνθεσις composition, Synthesis.] Derivation from a compound; conjoint combination and derivation, as a process of word-formation : see next.

1882 Cincinnati Coll. Announcement Prof. 10. It is said that synthesis from, and parasynthesis from not affect the accent, which is really tantamount to saying, that when the accent of a word is known ... we shall be able to judge whether a Greek grammarian regarded that word as a synthesis or parasynthetic compound. 1884 Amer. Jrnl. Philol. July 319 The principle of parasynthesis ... is more regularly and extensively developed here [in Portuguese] than in any other one of the Romance group of languages.

Parasynthetic (părăsĭnthe'tik), a. (sb.) Philol. [mod. f. Gr. παρασύνθετος 'formed from a compound' (f. παρα- beside + σύνθετος put together, compounded) + -ic. In mod.F. parasynthétique.] Formed from a combination or compound of two or more elements; formed by a conjoint process of combination and derivation. b. sb. A parasynthetic formation or derivative.

Applied, sep. in Romance Philology, to verbs derived from a combination of prepositions and object, with the addition of a verbal ending, to adverbs from phr. A bord, abandon from à bord, endroit from en droi, etc.; also to the derivatives of these, as en-taille-ment, etc. Many of these parasynthetic derivatives have entered Eng. from French, e.g. accoy, embark, endow, engraver; but native formations of this kind are rarely if ever made in Eng. Our parasynthetic derivatives chiefly consist of adjs. and sbs. formed by combining two words in some grammatical relation, and adding to the combination a formative suffix; e.g. from black (ox), blackhead, from old bat, old-batted, from old agent, old-agented, from big coat, big-coated, from fine-drawn, fine-drawer, fine-drawing, ill-favoured, ill-favouredness, or -favouredness, from ill-favour, etc. Thus blackeyed, big-coated, etc., notwithstanding the hyphen, are not formed from black + eyed, big + coated, etc., but from black eye + -ed, big coat + -ed, etc., the suffix indicating a formation not upon the elements next to it, but upon the combination of the two elements, which, of themselves, without the suffix, are only in grammatical collocation.

S. Kedd Greek, Pro Rhetor Norico 30 All the clauses from Sabbatos to the end of the sentence are parantactically, not syntactically arranged, that is, they are merely put side by side, and not linked together by particles.

‡ Parataxis (părătă'sĭs). Gram. [mod. a. Gr. παράταξις a placing side by side, f. παρατάσσ-ειν to place side by side, f. παρα- Para-[1] 1 + τάσσειν to arrange, τάξις arrangement.] The placing of propositions or clauses one after another, without indicating by connecting words the relation (of co-ordination or subordination) between them.

Herschel to invisible rays accompanying the orange and red rays in the spectrum, and having the quality of discharging the colour from paper tinted with certain vegetable juices: so called in reference to the neighbouring thermic or heat rays.

1845 Sir J. Herschel in Phil. Trans. I. 1 Certain rays, which ... accompany in the spectrum the red and orange rays, and are also copiously emitted by heated bodies short of redness. I would propose the term parathermic rays to designate them. 1849 Mrs. Somerville Connex. Phys. Sc. xxiv. (1858) 211 A new set of obscure rays to the solar spectrum, which seem to bear the same relation to those of heat that the photographic or chemical rays bear to the luminous.

‡ Parathesis (părăthē'sĭs). [mod.L., a. Gr. παράθεσις a putting beside, apposition, juxtaposition, f. παρατίθεν-αι to place beside, f. παρα- beside + τίθεν-αι to place, first placing, position, Thesis.]

1. In the United Kingdom, and some of the Colonies, the name of a subdivision of a county: applied to it primarily in its ecclesiastical aspect, but also as an area recognized for various purposes of civil administration and local government.

The name occurs in Norman French in the Laws of William I, c 1093, but has not been found in Eng. before the 13th c. Although the parochial system was more or less developed in many (perhaps most) parts of England before the year 1000, there is no word formed from parochia, nor any directly answering to it, in O.E. : the nearest equivalents being gemearcod 'parochially' (Rushw. Gosp. Matt. 20) to Thorpe Lament., and scrift-scir 'shrift-shire' (Canons of Edgar 21, Anc. Laws of Cnut xiii), both of 11th or late 10th c., the latter rendered parochia in the 13th c. L. version.

2. orig. A township or cluster of townships having its own church, and ministered to by its own priest, parson, or parish clergyman, to whom its tithes and ecclesiastical dues are (or originally were) paid. b. A later division of such an original parish for ecclesiastical purposes only, having its own church and clergyman.

The latter includes the ancient parochial chapelries of some of the large northern parishes (Craven, 31), Chapelry (1), and the more recent ecclesiastical districts constituted under the powers given by the various Church Building Acts, distinguished as new ecclesiastical parishes. In Scotland these are called parishes quoad sacra, while the original parishes which remain such for all purposes are parishes quoad civilia. The original parish when retained for civil, although subdivided for ecclesiastical purposes, is commonly distinguished as the civil parish, in Scotland a parish quoad civilia.

Many of the older colonies have parishes, both for ecclesiastical and civil purposes, frequently as electoral districts or divisions; in the newer colonies where there is no established church the parish has often no official existence, though the Church of England (and, in some cases, other Churches) has applied the name to areas formed for the organization of its own work: and the term is used in the same way by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

2. A district, often identical with an original parish, but often having quite different limits, constituted for various purposes of civil government, and thus designated a civil parish: a. primarily, such an area constituted for the administration of the Poor-laws, and sometimes distinguished as a poor-law parish; legally defined by Act 34 & 35 Vict. c. 63 § 3 as 'a place for which a separate poor-rate is or can be made, or for which a separate overseer is or can be appointed'. (This area at first coincided with the original parish in most cases.) Hence the phrase On the parish, in receipt of parochial relief; so to go on the parish, to be brought up by the parish, buried by the parish, etc.

Also b. An original parish, or other area, separately assessed for land-tax: a land-tax parish. 'They are described in the series of landtax accounts from 1690 to the present time, and are also defined in the Taxes Management Act of 1880' (Rhind by Stuart Hist. Scotl. XVIII. 298).

[Note. (a) Gr. παροικος was the sist. fr. from παροικος adj. (1 παρά fr., beside + οἶκος house, dwelling), in sb. Gr. "dwelling beside or near, neighbouring, a neighbour"; in LXX, N.T., and Christian writers, 'dwelling temporarily or sojourning in a foreign land, a sojourner'. As to which of these notions was present, when παροικία passed into ecclesiastical use, opinions differ: the earlier expositors (Odon, etc.) have taken it as 'the body of persons dwelling beside, and hence, the clergy alone, of a church or ecclesiastical centre'; but more recent writers, grounding their conclusions upon the usage of the LXX and N.T., take it as—'the body of sojourners'; holding the appellation to have been primarily applied to catholics of Jews of the Dispersion sojourning in Alexandria and other Gentile cities, and to have been from them continued or adopted as a name for 'the Christian brotherhood sojourning in a town or district'. (b) παροικία without reference to the spiritual use of wanders, expands (s Pet. i. 17; ii. 11): see Lightfoot J. Clement II. 6, Hatch in Dict. Chr. Antiq. s.v. Parish. (c) According to Lightfoot, παροικία was at first used in a much more general sense than διοικησις, diocese, of which it was later a synonym, as were by L. regiones, paroeciæ, pagi—the three even to the 12th c. The modern sense 'parish' appears already in St. Basil c 379. Although paroichia was used in the wider sense in the Councils of Chelyth a. D. 816, and Clovesho 825, and is so rendered once in 12th c. glossaries of Ps.-Wilcker 337/19 Diœcesis vel paroichia, triumphes] parish, as an English word, is found only with the modern meaning (viz. when used by later writers as a literal rendering of the Gr. or L. word: senses 2, 3). The relation to the original παροικία, paroecia, of later and med.L. parochia, presents difficulty. The latter could not arise out of the former by any normal phonetic process; and it has been suggested by various scholars independently that parochia is really a derivative from L. parochus (Gr. παροχος), the name of a local official in the country parts of Italy who supplied public personages with entertainment, etc., when they came into his district; and that this familiar term was popularly substituted for the unfamiliar paroecia. Cf. what is said under PARSON, as to the OHG. rendering of parochia by the apparently native pfarrun, pfarre.]

Hence Pa·rished a. (in senses 1, 2), having parishes.

1804 Life H. Kirke in Covenant. Bible I. 2 The country is somewhat wide and many-parished.

Parish (pærif), v. dial. [f. PARISH sb.] intr. To belong to or go with as part of a parish.

Parish clerk. An official appointed by the incumbent of a parish to assist in various duties connected with the church and its services: before the Reformation usually a member of one of the five minor orders; after the Reformation a layman, the office being often conjoined with that of sexton; by the Act of 1844, which at present regulates the office, the duties may be undertaken by a curate. See Clerk sb. 9 b.

One of the most prominent duties in former times, that of leading the responses (often without any following) is now generally given up (being performed by the choir and congregation), except at baptisms, funerals, etc.

3. The Great Council of the nation, which forms, with the Sovereign, the supreme legislature of the United Kingdom (formerly of the Realm of England), consisting of the three Estates, namely the Lords Spiritual and Temporal (forming together the House of Lords), and the representatives of the counties, cities, boroughs, and universities (forming the House of Commons). By some legal writers, the Sovereign, as part of the Legislature, is included in the Parliament; but this is not usual.

a. Viewed as a temporary assemblage of persons, summoned by the Sovereign, and after a time (the length of which is now limited) again dissolved, to be succeeded (formerly at an uncertain and often distant interval, but now within a very short period) by another assemblage similarly constituted.

This is, in its origin merely a development of more or less corresponding to the gradual evolution of the modern parliament from the Great Council. Stubbs Const. Hist., following the chroniclers, uses 'parliament' from 1246 onwards; but the 'parliaments' previous to 1295 belong rather to our next group, with progressive approaches to this one.

In this sense the word may be preceded, by a or the, and have a plural: as we speak of a new parliament, or of the first, second, or third parliament of Edward I, or of Queen Victoria, and sometimes indifferently many parliaments by distributive application: see 8.

b. Viewed as a permanent or continuous institution, the composition, character, and aim of which have changed from time to time, but which has itself a continuous history. In this sense usually without a or the, as plural (except in speaking of such institutions in different countries, as 'the Scottish and Irish Parliaments are now incorporated in that of Great Britain').

2. A violent access of action or emotion; a fit, convulsion (e.g. of laughter, excitement, rage, terror, etc.); also said of physical processes, as earthquakes or volcanic eruptions).

Paroxysmal (pærŏksĭz'măl), a. [f. prec. + -AL.] Pertaining to or of the nature of a paroxysm; marked by paroxysms; violent, convulsive.

1892 Edin. New Dispt. 124 The cruel Tartar did not forgo to keep in paroxysmal course and return. 1811 Shelley *Let. Subject to Fr. b. 1860. In Geol. Of or pertaining to a violent natural convulsion; sometimes = CATASTROPHIC, CATACLYSMAL. (In quot. 1877, Holding the theory of paroxysmal or catastrophic changes.)

1859 Emmons Princ. Geol. I. 460 Paroxysmal convulsions ... are usually followed by long periods of tranquility. 1861 Temple Front. Geol. 86 § 2. 224 The Paroxysmal School of Geologists. 1880 J. Geikie in Nature XXVII. 396 We have had experience of paroxysmal changes of level.

Hence Paroxy'smalist Geol. = PARATHEORIST; Paroxy'smally adv., in a paroxysmal way, by or in paroxysms or fits.

Paroxysmist (pærŏksĭz'mĭst). Geol. [f. as prec. + -IST.] One who attributes certain phenomena to paroxysms or sudden and violent natural convulsions; a catastrophist.

1863 Lyman Prob. Trinity xi. 337 The argument of the Paroxysmist would probably be something like the following.

Paroxytone (pără'ksĭtōʊn), a. and sb. Gram., chiefly Gr. Gram. [ad. mod.L. paroxytōn-us, a. Gr. παροξύτονος, f. παροξύ-νειν: bestile, pert + τόνος OXYTONE. In F. paroxyton (1550 in Hatz.-Darm.).] a. adj. Having an acute accent on the last syllable but one. Also fig. 1b. A word so accented.

1764 W. Hence Paroxytonic (-ĭ'nĭk) a., characterized by paroxytone accent or stress; Paroxytone, Paroxytonize vbs., to accent on the penultimate syllable.

1887 A. Mahn-Fassi in Amjerl. Brit. XXII. 344/2 As regards the tonic accent and the treatment of the vowels which come after it, Castilian may be said to be essentially a paroxytonic language, though it does not altogether refuse proparoxytonic accentuation. 1890 *Cent. He admitted however the difficulty of this accounting for the corresp. Italian parpagno, Engadine perpaun, and Sp. perpiaño, unless these are more or less altered adaptations of the Fr. word.]

'park'; all pointing back to a comb. WGer. parruk*, -ik. Found also in early mod.L. as parricus, parrus (Rh. 6. in Repert. Lanc.), and in mod. Romanic langs.: It. parco, Sp., Pg. parque, Fr. parque, parc, F. parc, whence ME. parc PARK, and mod. Ger. park, Du. park (in part). Also in Welsh parog (from ME. parrock), parc (from Eng.), Gael. pairc (from Eng.), Ir. park (from Fr.).
The ultimate origin and relations are disputed: see Diez, Koenig, Kluge, Franck. The OE. and cognate Ger. forms show that the word must have been in WGer. as early as the 4th c. The oldest sense in OE. and OHG. appears to be 'the enclosing fence or hurdles, etc.', rather than 'the enclosed space'. Diez and Kluge favour a Romanic origin, and possible connexion with L. parcĕre, parcus adj., but Zimmermann rejects this, because Port. parque (with parque, parquet, parquê suggests parcus, parrīcu- not parc-). A Celtic origin is not of the question (Chaucer-Pope); all the Celtic forms are late borrowings from Eng. and Fr. It is not improbable that parruk*, parrik*, was a doublet of L. Varro, parrus, OHG. pfarro, Gen. pfarres, in an original sense 'circular compass, precinct, district' (taken in Christian times as a convenient equivalent for med.L. parochia parish): cf. med. dial. Fris. pêr 'enclosure for beasts', and MS. parrus, Pan, PARR v.[1] 'to enclose, confine'.]

1. A bird of the order Psittaci, or family Psittacidæ, and spec. of the genus Psittacus; these are zygodactyl and zygodactyl, and have a short hooked bill and naked cere; many of the species have very beautiful plumage, and some of the fleshy-tongued ones can be taught to repeat words and sentences with great perfection: hence, much valued as cage-birds; the species most commonly kept being the Grey Parrot (Psittacus erythacus) of West Africa.
The order includes many genera and species chiefly inhabiting tropical and semi-tropical regions; a few are found in the temperate zones in N. America, Australia, and New Zealand. As differentiated from parrakeet, 'parrot' is applied to the medium-sized and larger species of the order. Various families, genera, and species have distinct names, as cockatoo, ara, lory, macaw, etc.
